Melatonin, the pineal hormone, is implicated in the control of numerous biological processes. It is endogenously produced in humans and many animals, and melatonin receptor agonists and antagonists are currently being developed. Recent investigations have shown the potential of melatonin for the treatment of skin diseases, such as acne and rosacea. However, very few studies have reported the effect of melatonin on psoriasis, a chronic immune-mediated inflammatory skin disease. The aim of this study was to examine the effect of melatonin on the development of psoriasis. The effect of melatonin was investigated on skin lesions, epidermal keratinocyte proliferation, and hyperplasia. Melatonin (2 mg/kg daily for 2 weeks) was given to DBA/1 mice either from the initiation or from the development of 2,4,6-trinitrobenzene sulphonic acid (TNBS)-induced chronic dermatitis. Quantitative assessment of skin lesions and epidermal thickness were performed histologically and cell proliferation was assessed using the 5-bromo-2'-deoxyuridine (BrdU)-immunohistochemistry technique. Administration of melatonin to mice with chronic dermatitis during the initiation of dermatitis induced an increase of skin lesions and epidermal thickness. Melatonin treatment during the development of the chronic dermatitis significantly reduced skin lesions and epidermal hyperplasia. Melatonin also significantly reduced epidermal proliferation in both models. Melatonin did not improve the skin lesions induced by chronic dermatitis from the initiation of the disease but provided some beneficial effects on skin lesions and epidermal hyperplasia when given f678ea9f9e
